Diane Wilkinson submitted the interim Northern Cape Freedom Project report for the period Dec 2016 to Dec 2017. This report is available on request. The report covers program implementation highlights, notable new developments, activities carried out with accomplishments of program objectives, challenges and corrective action, evaluation of program impact, media coverage, case studies and feedback.

Huge thanks to the incredible team who worked very hard on the project. Thank you to Vital Voices and the Global Freedom Exchange team who partnered with us financially through the small grant, to allow for this Project to take place. You have helped us make a great start to the fight against Human Trafficking in the Northern Cape Province and we are so grateful for this!

NO DATA ON FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING - WWW.IOL.CO.ZA

While South Africa has made strides in combating human trafficking, adequate data collection and collaboration between stakeholders is needed to get a better grip on the problem. This was the focus on the first day of the prevention and combating of trafficking in persons co-ordination workshop in Pretoria on Tuesday. Although minimal and scattered data was available on what has been termed “modern day slavery”, indications were that the problem was growing rapidly, Zhuldyz Akisheva, regional representative of the UN office on drugs and crime, said.

Akisheva said the main challenge, particularly for South Africa, was the lack of data, which made it difficult for role players to adequately determine how severe things were. She said for that reason, the organisation was working with the Department of Justice and Correctional Services in hosting workshops for all law enforcement agencies to come up with a unified approach.

“We need to find a way for the various law enforcement agencies to stop working in silos but to work more closely with civil society organisations,” she said. Akisheva said while information was lacking, it was important for better working relationships to be established, as having a single or 1000 lives affected by the issue was too many.

Arno Schaefer, head of co-operation with the EU delegation to South Africa, said even with the lack of official statistics from the various departments, work could still be done. That being for agencies to ensure better controls at borders and for authorities to focus on hot spots or areas susceptible to making use of trafficked labour.

Akisheva said while some data was available from the departments, it was difficult to compare information coming from different sources, as each had its data and it was not established to what extent that data spoke to others. The Deputy Minister of Justice and Correctional Services John Jeffery said despite recent reports of human trafficking in the country, great strides had been made as evidenced by the 2016 global slavery index, placing South Africa 27th out of 167 countries battling the problem.

That, as well as the recognition by the US state department’s trafficking in persons 2017 report’s chapter on South Africa, which took note that the government had demonstrated increased efforts by identifying and referring more than double the number of trafficked victims.

Similar to the international experts’ concerns, Jeffery said it was true that at the moment there was no systematic collection and analysis of data on trafficking of persons, and smuggling of migrants. He said law enforcement agencies needed to work together to tackle the problem.

Marcel van der Watt attended the UNODC / National Intersectoral Committee for Trafficking In Persons (NIC:TIP) workshop on 27 - 28 March 2018 in Pretoria. Some network partners also joined on the second day: Hope Risen, SA National Human Trafficking Resource Line, Salvation Army, IOM and Love Justice.

Marcel was interviewed on eNCA News live television and Talk Radio 702 on 11 January 2018 for comments of reports regarding public violence, drug dealing, human trafficking and xenophobia in Rustenburg.

Marcel addressed over 60 policy makers, politicians and researchers on 2 March on the nature and future of human trafficking in South Africa and joined others presenting on 5 March at Parliament’s multiparty women’s caucus sex work summit on the decriminalisation of sex work.

The hidden crime of human trafficking

MODERN DAY SLAVERY

Did you know that every 30 seconds* somebody becomes a victim of human trafficking? This is a shocking statistic and indicates that we are facing a humanitarian crisis.

While slavery was abolished more than a century ago, the truth is evident that it is more prevalent today than ever – in the form of human trafficking. In fact, there are an estimated 27 million people currently in slavery, or bondage, around the world, and only 1% of these people are ever rescued. In Africa, 4 out of every 1 000 people are victims of trafficking, with females (55%) and adults (74%) most likely to fall victim to such crime.

It's a murky world of young children sold as prostitutes, men held on farms with their passports confiscated, organs being removed or cleaners locked in houses and forced to work, to pay off the money they traffickers spent importing them.

Human trafficking is a complex, well-organised crime, involving elaborate and extensive networks of participants. The chain includes recruiters, taxi drivers, farm owners, landlords, people buying the services of the victims and henchmen to threaten the victim, or their families.

So, while nobody wants to think of such a horrifying crime, it is important that we consider that this could happen to someone we know and that we ensure we understand the ins and outs of human trafficking – protecting our families and loved ones.

Most at risk are the poor, unemployed, uneducated and those looking for a better life. Fraud and force are the main methods of recruiting them, by offering false job opportunities abroad in hotels, restaurants or beauty salons, or by promises of contacts in the sporting fields.

Victims are often offered all-expenses-paid travel to their new opportunity, but when they arrive, their passports are confiscated and they are forced to work to repay the costs. To keep them from rebelling, the victims may be drugged or threatened with violence, against them or their family back home.

One organisation fighting to eradicate human trafficking and slavery in South Africa, is the National Freedom Network (NFN). The NFN came about as a result of a number of individuals and organisations that were doing great work to combat human trafficking, but collaboration between them was initially limited. The NFN bridges the gap and helps them share information, tip-offs and best practices. Its goals are to provide easy access to counter-trafficking information, resources, events and news, and to connect people doing similar work, to share ideas and give them guidance.

Its website features news, video clips, academic research (related to South Africa), recommended books to read and movies to watch, and highlights local or international learning opportunities.

To support its work and help drive stronger awareness about this serious humanitarian issue, local advertising company - Ad Outpost – is giving the NFN free street pole advertisements, in addition to monthly financial support. These adverts aim to promote the NFN's latest campaign 'See something, Say something'. The campaign is supported by social media outreach, where the #seesomethingsaysomething hashtag is being used to call on all South Africans to take action against human trafficking.

Recent efforts by the NFN to highlight human trafficking saw it sponsor a short film called Unthinkable, which exposed a common form of recruitment into sex slavery called 'Loverboy recruitment' or 'Romeo pimping'.

Other recent efforts include:

- Helping Hope for Women to repatriate a family; and funding social workers to attend trauma training sessions organised by Hope for Women;
- Providing ongoing support to several Safe Houses;
- Contributing funds to the training of over 450 SAPS officials in Limpopo;
- Sponsoring the training of nearly 500 SAPS officials and other stakeholders by Love Justice.

How You Can Help

No matter who you are, you can do something to help. In fact, several victims in South Africa have been rescued because community members were vigilant and reported their suspicions.

As such, consider the following if you want to help:

- If you see something suspicious, report it to the police or the South African National Human Trafficking Resource Helpline on 0800 222 777.
- Educate yourself on the realities of human trafficking, by visiting the Human Trafficking Resources website: www.nfnresources.yolasite.com.
- Volunteer your skills at the NFN, by visiting: www.nationalfreedomnetwork.co.za.
- Donate clothes, non-perishable foods and toiletries to safe houses, or ask the NFN what specific items are needed for safe houses in your province.
- Be a conscious consumer by investigating which industries are heavily supplied by forced labour, and refrain from using such stores. Buy fair trade products that guarantee no slave labour in their production.

- If you are a business owner, the NFN encourages the offering of internships or skills training for trafficking survivors, or those at risk of being trafficked, and to employ survivors where feasible.
- Create awareness – go as big or small as you want to. Use social media, your company website, blog spot or local newspapers and magazines, or tell your friends and family about what you have learned.
